T&L 2900.04 – Building Healthy Relationships –
September 24 – October 22, 2018

This is a 3 credit professional development graduate course. Relationships are the vehicle that connects students to curriculum and instruction. Student and staff relationships affect the entire school and community. How is student learning enhanced by strong relationships? How can students learn and use relationship skills to the end that they will have a positive effect on student achievement? How can we develop strong, healthy, appropriate student-staff relationships? This 3-credit graduate course will explore answers to these questions and provide strategies for creating and maintaining healthy school and classroom relationships. The key strategies of listening, enhancing self-esteem and maintaining a healthy stress free lifestyle will also be emphasized. Course methodology will include a review of current and relevant research of the theories, principles and conceptual foundations related to the topic as well as presentations by current experts in the field, group interaction, and personal reflection and internet searches. Lots of ideas, materials, strategies and activities will be presented, shared, analyzed and evaluated
